THE IDEA

Design an inclusive, enjoyable, safe space for exploring the youth's thoughts. The coffee culture in Serbia seemed like a proper context that the youth could fit into without feeling pressured to attend.

The author of the workshop created a usable collection so that the participants could have a tactile experience during the workshop and tried to get participants to feel welcomed, get them in a relaxed homelike state, and ease the knowledge transfer process.

EXECUTION

01 Fifty-six high schoolers from three local high schools attended the workshop. The Art school, The Grammar school, and The School of Economics took part in this.

02 The workshop's topic was the origins of coffee consumption in the Balkans, what behavioral patterns it creates, and how it affects our day-to-day life.

03

04 Participants gradually opened different topics, such as conversations about applied arts, feminism, religion, and even the economy. Through the lucky mishap of having the workshop within the exhibiting room, museum personnel and visitors felt invited to come over for a chat or a cookie, so participants had an opportunity to hear some unique stories.

RECEPTION

01 Inspired attendees from the Highschool of Economics in Kraljevo recreated the entire workshop independently by adding their content and a new layer of meaning.

02 Their goal was to reconnect with active and retired professors, which showed the potential of this method for transgenerational knowledge transfer.

LESSONS LEARNED

Seeing how the workshop echoed and the potential for growing relationships with the audience, the National museum Kraljevo plans on reviving the workshop as an ongoing periodical program within the Legacy house of Olivera Radojković Čolović.

Enjoyment creates a community

You need to feel joy in order to spark joy

Enjoyment is something that you create through your own effort
